On the 27-01-16 at 15:00 to 28-01-16 15:00, Chris Green and Katheryn Owens stayed together in silence. This experiment formed part of an on-going project into how our bodies and memories archive the self and the other, as part of a larger research project concerning collaboration as a mode of existence in the everyday. It was intended to be a private performance with no audience; these notes being the only physical residual trace. However, due to our personal circumstances we are forced increasingly to work in our shared domestic environment. This brings with it an accidental audience of four other housemates, guests, and a dog. As we proceed with this research we are increasingly aware of our domestic / life / art / work merging. In bringing our practice into the home we find our collaborative partnership consists not just of the two of us, as the home shifts from being a feature of the everyday that we consider in our study of collaboration, to an active equal third member of this collaborative partnership.
